

On the Other Hand

Comparison and contrast paragraphs often prove useful. Sometimes you will only compare, sometimes you will only contrast, and sometimes you will do both. When you compare, you write about the things which are the same about someone or something. When you contrast, you write about the things which are different.

Think of two people whom you know. They can be friends or family members. One of them should be like you, and the other should be different from you. First, fill in the lines to write a comparison paragraph.

My _____
(friend or family member)

and I have several things in common. First, _____
_____.

We both also _____
_____.

A third thing we have in common is that we both _____
_____.

Because we have these things in common, we _____
_____.

Now fill in the lines to write a contrast paragraph.

My _____
(friend or family member)

and I are different in several ways. _____
(He or She)

thinks _____.

However, I think _____
(he or she)

Also _____.

I am different, though, because I _____.

In spite of our differences, we _____.

Extension: Choose a friend or relative whom you like and admire. Write a paragraph comparing and contrasting yourself with this person.
